

described by archaeologists as probably being “a seasonal plant procurement and processing site with little emphasis on hunting”. Roasting pits/hearths, lithic surface scatter, and a possible prepared surface were also reported by archaeologists in site records. The soil samples were identified by tribal representatives as coming from Serrano Ancestral Territory and being objects of cultural patrimony for the Serrano people. The one object of cultural patrimony is one lot of soil samples.

From 1970 to 1984, Donald Shusky, an amateur malacologist, collected marine shells, an animal tooth, and a clay object from his personal residence in Redlands, California. These materials were sent to the UCR Radiocarbon Laboratory to be dated and remained at UCR in the archaeological collections. The materials were identified by tribal representatives as coming from Serrano Ancestral Territory and being objects of cultural patrimony for the Serrano people. The three objects of cultural patrimony are one clay object, one lot of marine shells, and one lot of faunal bone.
