SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

Background

The federal government has significant authority to combat terrorism through financial services regulation. In some cases, the two-way flow of information between financial institutions and the government enables intelligence analyses that can be used to identify, disrupt, and prosecute terrorist networks. But some have argued that the growth of government power in this area has extended beyond terrorism and has permitted unreasonable risks to privacy and civil liberties.

By holding this forum, PCLOB will hear from experts about how the current regulatory system functions from both a national security and privacy and civil liberties perspective. Specifically, the forum will examine concerns raised by Members of Congress, businesses, and civil liberties advocates that due to anti-money laundering and other regulatory requirements, as well as vague regulatory supervision standards such as “reputational risk,” financial institutions may be encouraged to engage in the practice of debanking/de-risking, which may deny banking services to innocent individuals, groups, and organizations.

PCLOB invites input from all stakeholders including members of the public, representing a variety of backgrounds and perspectives. If a comment is submitted on behalf of an organization, the individual respondent’s role in the organization may also be provided on a voluntary basis. While PCLOB currently lacks a quorum, the agency is using this forum and the comments received to understand and scope potential future oversight.
