

complying with the labeling requirements takes at least three to four hours per label or more. To address these concerns, ITI suggested that the Commission allow the use of electronic labeling (e.g., QR code), leading to online manuals on the manufacturer's website.

The anonymous commenter stated that CPSC's burden calculations should reflect "real-world operational reality" to account for creating, verifying, scaling, and managing compliance artwork across packaging and documentation, which the commenter asserted, similar to ITI's comments, takes three to four hours per label.

The anonymous commenter also provided additional requests which include clarifying scope guidance for paperwork filings for 16 CFR part 1263, considering alternative formatting for small surfaces and/or allowing high-contrast monochrome printing on small retail packaging, eliminating "duplicate compliance paths," and streamlining recordkeeping to include e-labeling barcodes. The commenter did not elaborate on the concerns associated with duplicative compliance.

Response: CPSC adjusts burden estimates upward from 1.25 hours, for both labeling and recordkeeping, based on the information received from the commenters. CPSC adjusts burden estimates to two per response for labeling and two hours for recordkeeping, noting that response times to the collection will vary depending upon the size of the establishment, the number and type of products sold by the firm, and other factors outside of the control of CPSC, such as internal business practices. CPSC notes that burden estimates are annual and that labeling is not typically redesigned on an annual basis, therefore an estimate of two hours per year for labeling is reasonable.

With regard to comments on electronic labeling, the rule requires on-product warnings but does not prohibit additionally providing digital access to the safety statements. However, given that not all consumers have easy access to the internet or sufficient knowledge to use QR codes, the warnings language must be included physically along with the product in order to have the intended effect of providing warnings and safety information to consumers. Reese's Law requires that warnings be included: on the packaging of button cell or coin batteries and the packaging of consumer products containing such batteries; in any literature that accompanies a consumer product containing button cell or coin batteries; and, as practicable, directly on consumer products containing button cell or coin batteries.

Both UL 4200A–2023, incorporated by reference in 16 CFR 1263.3, and CPSC's requirements at 16 CFR 1263.4 include a table for letter size based on the display area, with smaller letters allowed on small surfaces; and offer alternative means of displaying the warnings when the display area does not allow the full warning. Furthermore, the rule does not prohibit high-contrast monochrome printing; referenced color schemes need to be in color only if the labels are printed in more than one color.

CPSC provides administrative guidance for compliance in many forms, including a business guidance page on its website: <https://www.cpsc.gov/Business-Manufacturing/Business-Education/Business-Guidance/Button-Cell-and-Coin-Battery>.
